Relates to the Interest of Money; Agriculture of England; Monopolies; Communities of Merchants; Means of encreasing Population; Trade, Taxes, etc. Under the heading of Incorporations of Trades there appears an interesting account of the Hudson's Bay Company and their Monopoly of Trade. It states: "The Hudson's Bay Company stands a sensible, and deplorable example to us, that an exclusive Company may, for a long time, enjoy a most lucrative trade, and contented with an exorbitant profit, in respect to the original sum of its stock, neglect all the facilities it had to extend it; in contempt of its duty, and of the national interest." The account proceeds with a short history of the Company from the granting of the original Charter in 1670 by Charles II; their application to Parliament in 1690 for a confirmation of its Charter; and their neglect in not employing proper methods for extending the Company's connections with the Indians.

- The Merchants of London finding their trade interests neglected and their losses continually increasing, prepared and laid before Parliament a petition in which they pointed out that the Commerce and Navigation of the Country had been continually exposed to the growing insolence of the enemy. That upwards of 300 vessels had already been lost, that the Navigation to and from the American Colonies had been exposed to the enemy, and that proper measures for their protection should immediately be made.

One of the earliest (if not the earliest) tracts published relating to the transportation of convicts to New South Wales. Pages 77-83 contain a scathing criticism of the projected Expedition to Botany Bay. The author describes it as one of those extraordinary acts which, as it has never had any precedent, will remain for ever without imitation. He forecasts the convicts speedily emancipating themselves from a feeble restraint, and filling the Chinese and Indian Seas with slaughter and depredation. In any case the Mother Country must relinquish any expectation of deriving any benefit from their labour and exertions, either immediate or remote. What would this "enlightened" writer say could he but see the colony now? This criticism did not appear until the 6th Edition of the tract.

Sir Charles Blagden (1748-1850) was elected Secretary of the Royal Society on May 5, 1784, by a large majority, following the resignation of Mr. Maty, consequent upon the quarrel between Sir Joseph Banks (the President), and his opponents. Blagden was a careful worker in physical research, and contributed many papers to the "Philosophical Transactions," besides publishing several papers on medical subjects. Matthew Boulton (1728-1809) was born in Birmingham, where his father had long been carrying on the trade of silver stamper and piercer. He entered his father's business early, and, following the death of his father in 1759, founded his famous Soho works. In partnership with James Watt he was largely instrumental in making the steam engine a commercial success. He later became interested in the reform of the Copper Coinage, and in 1788 set up several coining presses at Soho to be worked by steam. After making large quantities of coins for the East India Co., several foreign governments, and certain of the colonies, he undertook the production of a new copper coinage for Great Britain in 1797. Boulton held a prominent place in the scientific society of his time, and Benjamin Franklin, Priestley, Darwin, Wedgwood and Edgeworth were among his intimate friends.
